Criticism or Love?

The following, written by Merle Haynes of Montgomery, Ala., has an excellent message and deserves to be repeated:

I RECENTLY HEARD someone on the radio tell of a young lady whose mother said to her, "Now, be careful" as she left home in her car. Her friend asked, "Does your mother really think you won't be careful unless she tells you to?" "Oh, No," the girl replied, "that's just another way she has of saying, 'I love you.'" When someone says something to us, are we listening for criticism--or are we listening for love?

I immediately thought of my own mother and how it sometimes irritates me because, although I am now an adult, she still tells me when I leave to "be careful" and "always look in the back seat before you drive away." How sad I have been listening for criticism and failing to hear the sweet expressions of her love.

That applies not only to parents and children but also to our neighbors, our friends, or fellow humans. Are we hearing the sounds of love when they speak to us or are we interpreting their words as criticisms?
