PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION HONORS SEMINAR REPORT

Spring Semester, 1969

Mark Coppenger. Allen Eaton. Allen Hampton, and Roger Schoeniger

The Philosophy and Religion Seminar constructed the questionnaire for its project this semester. There was not any general hypothesis for there was not enough information on the subject to have a general hypothesis. The purpose of this questionnaire thus was to gather information in order to see a possible hypothesis concerning the subject of "Rebellion in the United States." Each question and each part of each question was evaluated from a percentage basis. Although this year's honors seminar cannot set out a plan for next year's honors seminar, the following areas are suggested as possible hypotheses for some group to study next year. From the questionnaires, the following trends seem to be apparent:

- (1) Those who live in rather small towns seem to disfavor rebellion whereas those in the more populated areas seem to favor this action as a way to bring social reform.
- (2) The older the person was, the more he tended to disfavor the use of rebellion as a means of social reform.
- (3) Those persons having children in the adolescent years sympathized with rebellion but did not indicate a real understanding of this method of social reform.
- (4) Those in the early adult years were about evenly divided on the issue.
- (5) The rebellion in the United States was generally seen as doing more harm than good.

None of the above trends are conclusive and should be used only as possibilities for future study. The Philosophy and Religion Honors Seminar hopes that some other group will possibly use this data in the future for study in the area of rebellion.
