ARKADELPHIA, Ark.—Ouachita Baptist University will launch a new Master of Education degree in curriculum and instruction in January 2022. The 12-month program, designed to help teachers enhance skills and increase earning potential, prepares educators to become curriculum specialists and instructional coordinators as well as grow their skills in the classroom.

“This program is for every teacher with a heart for students,” explained Dr. Gail Hughes, director of graduate studies in education. “In addition to designing effective curriculum for diverse students, we’ll look at current issues in culture, discuss how to approach them in the classroom and reflect on how faith guides our work as teachers. We will use data to plan strategies that will close achievement gaps and determine the best technology tools to engage students.”

Hughes said she has adopted a motto for the program that embodies all she hopes the degree is about: “Live for God, love others and teach all students.”

The fully online program offers classes asynchronously so that students can complete course work on a schedule that best works for them. An optional weekly group session, available online or in person, allows students to engage more deeply with the program director and connect with one another.

Applications will open September 1 for the Spring 2022 semester. There will be five semesters each academic year. Courses are offered without prerequisites, so students may enter the program at the beginning of any of the five entry points and work through the 10-course rotation without interruptions.

According to the Learning Policy Institute, beginning teachers who feel inadequately prepared are “two-and-a-half times more likely to leave the classroom after one year compared to their well-prepared peers.”

The Ouachita master’s program in curriculum and instruction will provide teachers with that critical preparation.

“It’s an important degree for any teacher, especially new teachers,” observed Dr. Jeff Root, dean of Ouachita’s Huckabee School of Education and School of Humanities. He explained that the program will equip teachers with strategies to improve classroom instruction and give graduates the qualifications for promotion within the academic structure of a school system.

“I am particularly excited that our ‘Teaching as a Calling’ course will focus on the reason we chose to teach in the first place – as a ministry and service to future generations,” he added. “It’s very challenging to be a teacher in today’s world, and it’s important to be reminded of the eternal importance of the work.”

Curriculum and instruction is a rapidly growing discipline. According to the Bureau of Labor Statistics, “employment of instructional coordinators is expected to grow 6 percent” over the next eight years, which is faster than the average for all occupations.

“Adding the Master of Education in curriculum and instruction is a natural extension of the legacy of our undergraduate teacher training program,” explained Dr. Monica Hardin, associate vice president for graduate and online education. Hardin expressed gratitude for Dr. Hughes and her vision for the program, adding that under Hughes’ leadership, “we will meet the needs of teachers who seek to view their calling as teachers through the lens of faith.”

Hughes, an award-winning professor and early adopter of online instruction, joined Ouachita’s faculty in 2021 to lead the new program. As a licensed teacher with an emphasis in secondary mathematics, she has worked with undergraduate and graduate students in remedial mathematics through doctoral courses across the disciplines of research, statistics and education. Hughes has more than 100 scholarly contributions to her name and serves as a site visitor for the Council for the Accreditation of Teacher Education Programs (CAEP).

The Master of Education program builds on Ouachita’s strong undergraduate foundation in education.

“We have seen unprecedented growth in our undergraduate teacher education program in recent years,” Root said. “Our students are highly motivated and ready to devote their working lives to the betterment of students. We believe like-minded teachers will show the same enthusiasm for our graduate program, and we believe they will complete the degree with a stronger base of knowledge and mindset to make a difference in the lives of their students.”
